History of the Red Bridge and Cicero

The culture and heritage of the Town of Cicero date back to the first settlers who platted the town in 1834. In 1835, the town was formally established, and the name Cicero Creek was shortened to Cicero. One of the first governmental buildings established in 1839 was the first post office located in Jackson Township.

Cicero was the home to the first bridge built (1838) in Hamilton County over a significant stream, Cicero Creek. The railroads in 1853 accounted for a growth in industry, such as flour mills, steam sawmills, and, with the abundance of natural gas, two glass factories. In 1870, the first bridge was converted into a covered and painted red bridge; the "Red Bridge" became one of the Town's most memorable landmarks, and the Red Bridge image is still used today as the Town's trademark.

The bridge was torn down in the early 1950s to make way for the construction of Morse Reservoir, another significant milestone in the Town's history. The construction of Morse Reservoir in 1956, the northern end of which lies in Cicero, also brought more development to the town. The opening of Morse Reservoir in 1956 brought a wave of steady growth and development.

Today, Cicero offers its residents the qualities of a small town with the recreational amenities of the lake and the convenience of being close to the larger communities of Indianapolis, Kokomo, and Anderson.
